Is it possible to earn a living in the audio-visual industry?

I know some people that have been doing AV work for some years. They just keep on doing it for whatever reason they keep on doing it. It certainly is very rewarding for a lot of people as they use it as a steppingstone to move up into the film industry, where they can get a chance to work on movies and so on. Remember that the hours are extremely erratic. There are times when you are overloaded with telephone calls, can you work? If you were 2 or 3 people you could have all the work, you could get. And there are the times when there is nothing going on and you are sending out messages to all the shops, saying have you got anything going on? Have you got anything? And you're sitting at home twiddling your thumbs, and not doing anything.

The entire audio-visual industry is based on a schedule that is totally unexpected. There is no nine to five in this business. There are a lot of downtimes when there are very few events, and then there are busy times when you'll be overtime and sometimes overtime on top of overtime. There really isn't a lot of standard. Wage rates can vary depending on if your employer is a small av company or an international company. And, there are union and non-union contractor that hire people too.

Most av technicians are freelance. Sometimes called contract workers. It depends on how you work in your life, and so on. You will find that a lot of time, especially the show operators tend to be freelancers. If they are freelancers, they work for a lot of different companies. Most companies have a 4-hour minimum call. So, if they call you in to do an event you can expect to have at least four hours of work. Some of the freelancers will negotiate day rate, half-day rate, things like that. Freelancers, or contract workers, often work for many different companies and they are often hired because of their special experience and ability they are hired for the event and then that's the end of their responsibility. So, it's often hard when you work for two or three companies that might be a fierce competition in the market. Each time you work for those different companies you must be the face of that company. It is a little bit awkward when you are working for multiple companies.

Bigger companies have different situations, they often have very strict guidelines about how wages and hours are counted. The working conditions are often different, quite often you may be given a specific task and that will be the task you will do for the whole shift, depending on the size of the task that is involved, for the whole shift. The bigger companies tend to have larger crews when doing setups. The wage rates don't really change a whole lot, just the working conditions.

There is a lot to say about what an av technician is all about. It is a challenging job, it's a job that can earn your keep. It's also a great opportunity especially in the case, like I am as a show operator, you get to meet a lot of very interesting people and have a lot of fun. And you learn a lot. I have worked in a lot of professional conferences, shows and events. Some of them are boring, some of them you learn something, but you are always earning a living.
